Helmet-to-helmet collision

EDIT PAGE

For football head to head contact is smashing between the helmets of two players with a high degree of force. Such collisions are hazardous due to the high risk of injury they present, and intentionally causing them is banned in most leagues. Possible injuries include concussions, spinal cord injuries, and even death. Helmet manufacturers are given the responsibility to make helmets as best as possible to protect against injuries from such collisions.^[1]

Major football leagues such as the NFL and NCAA have taken a tougher stance on helmet-to-helmet collisions since US Congress has launched an investigation into the effects of repeated concussions typically suffered by football players.^[2]
